At the dawn of modern consciousness the Knights Templars unfurled a new spiritual impulse. By 1307, however, innovative Templar initiatives in the fields of architecture, agriculture, medicine, and banking were impeded by a jealous king, who condemned leading knights to burn at the stake.

How does the Templars' Sacrifice reveal a destiny of courage? How did their Rosicrucian successors go 'underground' to win 'inner armor' and a more reliable form of spiritual experience? How can today's collaborative strivings for spirit knowledge comprise the social fabric of a higher form of community? How does community life counter the activity of evil and help forge individual capacities capable of meeting everyday challenges? Out of a modern Michaelic fulfillment of the Templar impulse, we can discern indications for building the Temple of the Universally Human—a new transformation of the historic Temple of Solomon.

David Lenker is a Class Holder of the School of Spiritual Science and Chairman of the Susquehanna Corps de Michael—Anthroposophical Society in Hershey. He met Anthroposophy, the awareness of one's humanity, at The Harrisburg Academy and was a founding teacher of the Susquehanna Waldorf School. David has spoken across America on topics arising out of spiritual science.
